It once to virtue, and to thee, was true: And through what may befall, it must and will, With all its faults and weakness, love thee still; Though Fate should urge it, e en to do thee wrong. Gratitude deathless, and affection strong, For thee, for thee, my prince, from this torn heart, Will only with life s latest pulse depart! 15. Is he so obdurate that he can boast Of his affection, when betraying most? Ever the victim, and the slave of feeling, That which his bosom feels, he is revealing: An hour may pass, and in a sterner vein, All his dark dreamings will return again, And he unpitying then will wonder why, He hath relented to a tear or sigh. And Rindhole...
