Excerpt: . . . likely, said Mr. Sampson, moodily. A young lady of your stamp wont remain single. Youre too attractive and too lively. No, youll marry some scamp for the sake of his good looks: and perhaps the day will come when youll remember this evening, and feel sorry that you rejected an honest mans offer. They were at the house by this time, much to Celias relief, as she felt that the conversation could hardly be carried on further without unpleasantness. She stopped in the hall, and offered her hand to her dejected admirer. Shake hands, Mr. Sampson, to show that you bear no malice, she said. Be assured I shall always like and respect you as a friend of our family. She did not wait for his answer, but tripped lightly upstairs, determined not to make her appearance again that evening. Tom Sampson was inclined to return to his own house, without waiting to say good-night to his client, but while he stood in the hall making up his mind on this point, John Treverton came out of the dining-room to look for him. Why, Sampson, what are you doing out there he cried. Come in and have some supper. You havent eaten much since we left Paris. Much, echoed Sampson, dismally. A segment of hard biscuit on board the boat, and a cup of weak tea at Dover, have been my only sustenance. But I dont feel that I care about supper, he added,...
