Not illustrated. 1877 Excerpt: .cut off at the supports only by those lines which pertain to the standard span, or that span from which we take our reduction basis and pole distance. For lines in the other spans the above does not hold good without modification. It is, however, always possible, at least for from two to five symmetrical spans, to observe the above conditions. In those cases where this is not possible, an easy graphical multiplication of the segments by the square of the ratio of the spans will give the moments. We see also the reason why, for four symmetrical spans, the second and not the first must be taken as the standard span. If the construction of the moments over the supports is our sole purpose, as is in practice the case, the polygon need not be drawn. We have only to find our fixed points, and...
