Channel Measurements 7 Extra consideration was given to features when more used when field notes and photographs supported the higher than one was present at the same spot; for example, combina-values, for example, when a cross section was affected by tions of a distinct rounded convex slope change from the bank backwater from a log or boulder downstream. to the flood plain with mature plant growth, or a convex slope The high-water-mark profiles were used to supplement, change at the edge of topsoil were regarded as especially good or at most sites, replace the use of estimated channel dimen-bankfull indicators. sions from flow measurements at streamgages as a means In most reaches assessed in this study, there were one or of choosing among plausible bankfull features at the same more reaches with more than one feature on the bank at the longitudinal station. Instead of referring to estimated bankfull same longitudinal station that could plausibly be regarded as elevations and dimensions derived from flow measurements, the bankfull feature. In these cases, all the plausible bankfull the elevation of a plausible bankfull feature was compared features at the station of interest were surveyed, and the final to that of the high-water-mark profile, while considering the determination of which to use was made with the profile plot frequency of the peak. At gaged sites, the magnitude and used as a supplement to field notes. frequency of the peak that left the marks was known. The frequency of peak flow at ungaged sites was estimated by comparison to flow at...
