This study should include a consideration of the physical properties of density, stiffness, damping and porosity with a view to the development of a suitable mechanical theory. (3) The study of the transmission of sound through actual building constructions, the tests being carried out under conditions approximating those found in standard practice. In these tests, distinction should be made between the case in which the sound passes from the air through the partition, and that in which the source of sound is in intimate contact with the structure. A study of the various sounddeadening materials and the conditions for their most effective use should be included. BIBLIOGRAPHY Tyndall, John. Conduction of sound by solids. Sound, pp. 78-79.
